Introduction by Pentti Saaritsa 1 I have longed for you as the burning heath for rain, I have asked for you as fingers of moss for shade, I have yearned for you as the dusty mind for tears, and I have loved you as distant lightning the dark, I have been in you as flowering pine in the wind. Halliday considers the 20th-century canon from an intimate vantage: She sees not some abstract patriarchy but the patriarchs themselves, with their bypass scars and their tired pick-up lines.

She asserts racist attitudes are assimilated[] using interactions children Hilbert is at once ironic, dark, and witty. He covers his grey floor with glowing carpets. Dolly is too young to join the other colonialists as they gather at the church Christmas greens to celebrate.
