Epictetus - a proponent of the wonderful practice of self-scrutiny applied with kindness - proceeds to offer a meditation on loosening the grip of grief in parting permanently from someone we have loved: When you are delighted with anything, be delighted as with a thing which is not one of those which cannot be taken away, but as something of such a kind, as an earthen pot is, or a glass cup, that, when it has been broken, you may remember what it was and may not be troubled... What you love is nothing of your own: it has been given to you for the present, not that it should not be taken from you, nor has it been given to you for all time, but as a fig is given to you or a bunch of grapes at the appointed season of the year.
